Officers Of Claims Conference Go To Bonn To Discuss Problems

Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany; Jacob Blaustein, senior vice-president; and Moses A. Leavitt, treasurer, spent three days in Bonn, Germany, to discuss the problems of the supplementary laws on restitution and indemnification with members of the German Government.

They met the Chancellor, Dr. Adenauer; the Vice-Chancellor, Prof. (Dr.) Erhard; the Foreign Minister, Dr. Schroeder; the Finance Minister, Dr. Dahlgrueu; and members of Parliament: Mr. Etzel, former Finance Minister; Mr. Erler, Vice-Chairman of the Parliamentary Group of the Social Democratic Party; Mr. Hirsch, and Prof. Boehm, Chairman, and Vice-Chairman, respectively, of the Indemnification Committee of the Bundestag.

The representatives of the Claims Conference made it clear to the members of the German Government that while they welcome the fact that after years of negotiations the Finance Minister is on the point of presenting drafts of the two bills to the Cabinet and the Parliament, they have strong objections to various provisions of the bills and are opposed to them in their present form. They criticised above all the attempt to take away certain rights from categories of Nazi victims, which these have enjoyed till now.

They also demanded that the claims of the Nazi victims, who [illegible] cannot file claims under the present law, should not be taken care of, as it is stipulated now, by a special fund, but included into the existing indemnification law. Also they raised objections to a number of other provisions of the bills. The Finance Minister assured the representatives of the Claims Conference that while he does not want to delay the presentation of the bills to the Cabinet and to the

Marriage And Divorce Rate

A Savannah, Georgia, Orthodox rabbi warned that a growing divorce rate among Jews, and increased inter-marriage with non-Jews, have become "great and deep concerns" for rabbis all over the country.

"They are problems which haunt each and every one of us," Rabbi Abraham I. Rosenberg, religious leader of Savannah's Congregation Bnai Brith Jacob, told his colleagues at a Sabbath service at the Pine View Hotel, in Fallsburg, N. Y., says the New York Herald Tribune. The service ended the six-day 27th annual convention of the Rabbinical Council of America.

Rabbi Rosenberg attributed the "breakdown of the moral fiber of family living" among Jews to the removal of religious practices, which until now, he said, have inculcated a control factor into Jewish life. "Whenever you introduce God into everyday living," he commented in his sermon to the rabbis, "then you automatically set up a built-in control which prevents overindulgence of any kind."

He cited observance of dietary regulations, the concept of the home as a temple, the table as an altar, parents as priests, children as priestlings, and marital relations as a union of souls.

Compared with the national rate of one divorce in every four marriages, the Jewish divorce rate is negligible, "but it is growing," he said. The trend has been alarming Jewish religious leaders for a decade, Rabbi Rosenberg added.

"It is fine to be a humanist," he said of the sloughing off of religious observances, "but if you do [illegible] it becomes very difficult to become conscious of God."

Rabbi Rosenberg said that the virtual "non-existence" of excessive intoxication and alcoholism among Jews could be traced directly to the concept of the sacrificial use of wine in Judaic ritual. A recent Yale study [illegible] alcoholism bore out this theory, he said.

Of intermarriage, Rabbi Rosenberg said he had found among

Israel Enacts New Laws On Justice Principles In The Bible And Other Jewish Law Sources

Dr. Dov Joseph, the Israeli Minister of Justice, has set out to clear up the hodge-podge in Israel's statute books. He has taken steps to replace the relics which have remained from the period of British rule and to modify and improve laws inherited from the era of the British mandate.

In an interview with the London Times, in Tel Aviv, the Minister said that one of his goals is to repeal a Palestine Order in Council which provides that when Israeli law is not clear, reference should be made to English common law and principles of equity. Having regard to the considerable legislation already promulgated and the new legislation he is planning, Dr. Joseph said it will be possible to repeal that provision in about two years.

The legal hodge-podge results from the fact that the 37 founding fathers who proclaimed the independence of Israel on May 14, 1948, extended the validity of everything in the Palestine statute books on that date except those British measures which restricted Jewish immigration and acquisition of land and were deemed repugnant to the spirit of the Jewish state.

Hence, the Israelis retained the Mejels, the Ottoman civil code which was based on Muslim canons; French commercial and maritime laws which nineteenth-century sultans enacted to meet pressure for reforms by European powers; Acts by the Imperial Parliament from the period of British rule; orders by His Majesty in Council; and a patchwork of ordinances promulgated by British high commissioners to meet conditions as they rose.

Nearly one of these laws [illegible] Knesset during the past 15 years and hundreds of new measures have been adopted, but the statute books are still studded with items of jurisprudence unsuitable for modern society.

Dr. Joseph has instructed his ministry to draft a series of laws to replace the Ottoman civil and land codes. Committees of jurists, including judges, professors, and lawyers, have been set up to examine the drafts and suggest improvements before they are submitted to the Government and to the Knesset for approval.

The Minister said the laws bequeathed by the British have on the whole been found suitable for retention with some adjustments. In fact, commercial and civil laws enacted since Israel became independent have been modelled on English law. "We closely follow reports by committees set up in England to see what they propose, but we have our own views," Dr. Joseph said to the London Times.

The amendments to British laws which have been found necessary have concerned mostly penalties rather than principles. Hanging, except for war crimes and treason during hostilities, and whipping have been abolished, while penalties for hostile infiltration and harbouring infiltrators have been stiffened. There is still much to be done.

Some of the penalties had been geared to conditions in a simple, pastoral society rather than a modern community. For example, injuring a beast of burden is punishable by 14 years' imprisonment; wilfully damaging a tree by five years in jail; while knocking down a human being with a car and causing death through negligence carries a maximum penalty of two years.

As for the Ottoman laws, Dr. Joseph noted that the Turks themselves had cleaned them out when Ataturk established the republic and adopted a European code. Shlomo Fitoussi, deputy state attorney and a specialist in Ottoman law, observed: "The principles of the Mejels are more or less good, but the laws are based on a primitive way of life. The land laws [illegible] from the feudal way [illegible] the Ottoman Empire are [illegible] large part of the land in Israel

Year-Long Survey Of [illegible] Cites Use By Anti-Semites ... In Unstable Lands In Turmoil

A report which said that anti-Semitism was being exploited as a political weapon in countries that face political turmoil or instability, cited Argentina in particular. This was a major finding of a year-long survey of anti-Semitism in eleven European and South American countries, says the New York Times, conducted by the American Jewish Committee which is devoted to the safeguarding of the civil and religious rights of Jews in America and abroad.

The survey, based on reports by the Committee's offices throughout the world, was made public at its 56th annual meeting at the Commodore Hotel, in New York, by A. M. Sonnabend, its president.

The Committee noted that "waves of anti-Semitic terror — threats, knifings, bombings — accompanied Argentina's political and economic upheavals during recent years." These upheavals, the Committee said, "had the secret backing of certain military leaders with strong influence in the Police Department."

It was not until this year, the survey noted, that the Argentine Government outlawed the Tacuara and the Guardia Restauradora, the two neo-Fascist groups chiefly responsible.

The Committee said that in addition to violent anti-Semitism, stemming from Argentine influences early in World War II, "non-violent anti-Jewish [illegible] has long been growing, particularly in the upper strata [illegible]." It added that the future [illegible] of Argentine Jews depended on the restoration of stable [illegible].

In [illegible] were many [illegible] in the countries [illegible] the report said that only a comparatively small number posed any major threat.

The report attributed a series of anti-Semitic uprisings last year in Uruguay "to the work of terrorists from near-by Argentina," adding that strong action was taken by Uruguayan officials to prevent further incidents, says the New York Times. Brazil was found to be "essentially free from anti-Semitism" and it was noted that sporadic incidents in 1962 and this year "were roundly condemned by public opinion."

The Soviet Government was sharply indicted in the report for what was described as "its official anti-Semitic policies." The report added that Soviet officials continued to "abridge the religious and cultural rights of Jews, and restrain Jewish community life."

The report said that attitudes toward Jews in Western Europe were undergoing "a profound change, . . . the people of those nations feel a sense of shame over the fate of 6,000,000 Jews murdered during the Hitler period."

In this connection, the report declared that "Christian leaders and some churches" had now undertaken to re-examine teaching texts and materials "which have all too often served to perpetuate anti-Jewish prejudice."

A seven-year study at the Yale Divinity School recently examined the extent of bias in more than 100,000 Protestant religious texts and teachings. The findings were [illegible] in a book, "Faith And Prejudice," written by Dr. Bernhard E. Olson, of the Union Theological Seminary. The book isolates the themes that give rise to the most negative references to Catholics and Jews.

Miss Johnson said that the wedding would not take place "for about a year." Miss Johnson, sophomore at the University of Texas, was graduated from the National Cathedral School for Girls. SEARCH FOR SURVIVORS OF NAZI FORCED LABOR CAMPS IS UNDER WAY

Survivors of 24 Nazi forced labor camps strung along the transit road between Galicia and Ukraine are being sought urgently by the World Jewish Congress headquarters in New York. They are required as witnesses against a considerable number of Nazi criminals now under investigation in Germany for their participation in crimes at the camps.

The camps were situated along what was known at the time as the Durchgangstrasse IV (Transit Road IV), and housed tens of thousands of Jews herded into the forced labor sites. The camps concerned were: Borki-Wielki; Grodek-Jagielonski; Hermanow; Jaktorow; Jezierna; Kamionka-Strumilowa; Kamionki near Tarnopol, Camps I and II; Kurowice, with the camp Ostrow; Laki-Wielki; Lawrykowce; Lemberg Janowska; Lemberg DAW; Lemberg Julag; Maksymowka; Mosty-Wielki; Pluhow; Podkamien; Przemyslany; Sasow; Skalat; Tarnopol, with the camps Zbaras, Zaloscie and Zagrobela; Winniki; Zborow; Zloczow.

Testimony is imperative in view of the fact that the preliminary investigation into the crimes will be concluded shortly and the matter transferred for further action. Anyone who survived these camps or anyone acquainted with survivors is requested to contact Dr. Nehemiah Robinson, Director of the Institute of Jewish Affairs, World Jewish Congress, 15 East 84th Street, New York 28, N. Y.

The World Jewish Congress in New York is seeking also two survivors of the Nazi concentration camp of Mauthausen in Germany: Jean Frederic Veith, born in 1930 in Moscow; Maurice Lampe, born in 1900 in Roubaix. Both men appeared as witnesses before the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal and are now badly needed as witnesses in the cases of a number of Nazis now under investigation in connection with crimes committed at Mauthausen.

THE SECOND "DIALOGUE IN ISRAEL"

make them any less Jewish values."

Mrs. Jacqueline Kahanoff, Israeli author and critic, commented that a "Jewish feeling precedes both knowledge of Jewishness and the assumption of Jewish identity."

As the Jerusalem dialogue neared its close, with questions and comments from members of the audience, some 700 Israelis of various national origins, including many American-and British-born Jews, one listener rose and declared: "We need you Americans in Israel, not only for the economic strength you can add and the technical skills you possess, but especially for your tradition and moral courage in fighting for human liberty wherever that fight must be fought. We Israelis can use some of this kind of courage. Too many of us lack this quality."

The "dialogue" then moved to Tel Aviv, with a new set of Israeli participants to discuss the role and responsibility of the Jewish writer to the Jewish community. Prof. Sol Liptzin, of City College of New York, chairman of the American Jewish Congress Commission on Jewish Affairs, opened the discussion on the theme: "What Is a Jewish Book?" He called for Jewish writers to identify themselves and their work with the Jewish community. He declared:

"Identification means not holding oneself icily aloof from Jewish group interests, not keeping an escape hatch open to an alien reality, not being mired in self-hatred, not being callous toward fellow-Jews in other lands." He urged Jewish writers to approach the Jewish community with love and reverence. But Prof. Liptzin's view was disputed by the Israeli as well as the American writers participating in the "dialogue".

Leslie Fiedler asserted that the senaitive writer must be true to his personal vision, and he urged Jewish writers to dissociate themselves from all Jewish organizations if they wanted to remain true to that vision. Moshe Shamir, leading Israeli novelist added:

"There are many who demand that an author deal with Jewish subjects, tradition, and history. But the Jewishness of an author must be not a bar but rather a challenge to his creative freedom. We cannot, we must not, be influenced by those seeking to advance Jewish identification. Their interest is the Chosen People. Our interest as writers is choosing people."

Philip Roth told the audience: "The writer's sense of life and of literature is hardly 'determined' by what one might call his 'Jewishness' although it may often be colored by it. Rather, the writer's art, like all art, is determined by the depth and quality of his individual talent, intelligence, and sensibility, whose origins we really cannot determine."

Similar views were expressed by Yaakov Malkin and Aharon Megged, young Israeli writers who participated in the panel session, who agreed that their function as writers was not to protect the Jewish community but to reflect the concerns of humanity. In an eloquent affirmation of his Jewishness, Megged declared:

"For me, Judaism is not a religion, not an ideology, not a philosophy, and not a way of life. It is, rather, a fact and a fate. I am not a Jew in order to fulfill a special spiritual mission to the world. I am not a Jew in Israel in order to give the Jews of America a feeling of satisfaction that in me is fulfilled whatever is not fulfilled in them. I am not a Jew in order to be different from all other peoples. I am a Jew because I am a Jew. Being an Israeli Jew is not a matter of consciousness for me, nor is it a problem. It is life itself."

ISRAEL BASES NEW LAWS ON THE BIBLE

today is miri, which means it belongs to the Emir, a relic of the period when Palestine was incorporated into the expanding empire and newly conquered lands were taken over by the sultan. Miri land cannot be assigned in wills, and this has caused holdings to be divided down the generations in accordance with laws of inheritance and to be split into small and often unworkable parcels.

In drafting new laws, Dr. Joseph said, Israel tries to base them on principles of justice laid down in the Bible and elaborated in the Talmud, Mishnaic commentaries, works of Maimonides, and other sources of traditional Jewish law.

"This is a great fountain of sound, just principles of law and part of our national heritage," the Minister said, to the London Times. "Regard has to be had for ancient Jewish law when it is as good as any other, but in cases where it is unsuitable or not adaptable to present needs we depart from it and study modern European codes."

YEAR-LONG SURVEY OF COMMITTEE

INTER-MARRIAGE, DIVORCE RATE

youth at his synagogue a search for guidance on the subject, says the New York Herald Tribune. They felt, he said, that their parents had failed to discuss the question with them.

"I have tried to explain that parents often give their children the things they themselves missed. Present-day parents have heaped luxury and comforts on their children, thinking this will provide all the security they need. But children want guidance — they want their parents to say 'No' on this question of mixed marriages — and the parents do not know how to discuss it."

Protestant and Roman Catholic clergy, he observed, have voiced similar anxieties about intermarriage among the various faiths.

The Council wound up its session with a catalogue of resolutions. In them the Council expressed support for President Kennedy's civil rights legislation, urged the State Department to withhold aid to Arab states, says the New York Herald Tribune, and asked the Post Office Department to halt mailings of hate literature.

OFFICERS OF CLAIMS CONFERENCE

Bundesrat before the parliamentary summer recess, so as to set the parliamentary machinery into motion, he is ready to continue talks with the representatives of the Claims Conference and to discuss their proposals and demands.

The Claims Conference is determined to draw the attention of the German parties and of public opinion, in Germany and outside of it, to the just demands of the persecutees as far as they remain unfulfilled in the new bills, and do everything to bring about necessary substantial improvements. The Claims Conference hopes that both the Federal Government, the Laender, and the Bundestag, will recognize the supreme moral duty of Germany to do the utmost to compensate the victims of Nazism at least materially, in a generous way, and that the leaders of Germany will regard this sacred obligation as over-riding fiscal and financial considerations.

★ JEWISH VOCATIONAL ★

Service assisted almost 2,500 residents of Metropolitan Toronto of all religions and nationalities in 1962, Marvin Fremes, president, said at the annual meeting at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. Most of these were either young people of school-leaving age, handicapped persons, or unskilled, and semi-skilled workers, including new Canadians and older workers, of groups most affected by current manpower developments. E. Manning Sprackman was elected president. He had been senior vice-president for the past two years, and is chairman of the Hillel Foundation advisory committee. Other new officers are: Robert Hall, senior vice-president; David Mouckley, Barrie D. Rose, vice-presidents; Manny Rotman, treasurer; Harry J. Waisglass, secretary. Last year 538 individuals were given vocational counseling; and now a group program will supplement individual counseling. This agency conducts three rehabilitation workshops. The first helps persons recovering from physical and mental illness to return to employment; another tries to improve the employability of persons receiving private or public welfare assistance; a third is for residents of the Jewish Home for the Aged. Last year, of 175 severely handicapped persons who were offered rehabilitation service, 82 were placed in jobs or vocational training schools in preparation for employment. Mr. Fremes said that technological innovations, including automation, are making unskilled and semi-skilled workers increasingly expendable and hard to place. If these workers happen to be beyond middle-age, lack a good command of English, or have a slight physical infirmity, their problem is acute. Last year 1,780 job openings were registered at this agency by employers, and 626 placements were made. Soon the market for such workers will dry up almost completely. Experiments with vocational retraining to equip men and women with marketable skills has begun. In a six-week course men are trained for jobs as caretakers, janitors, and maintenance workers. Last year 238 men enrolled and 166 completed the course, and through the co-operation of the National Employment Service a high percentage was placed after training. Recently, instruction in basic English has been added. This agency is affiliated with the United Jewish Welfare Fund, and a beneficiary of the United Community Fund of [illegible].

The Second "Dialogue In Israel"

The second "dialogue in Israel" sponsored by the American Jewish Congress drew such an enthusiastic response that the event may be turned into an annual public conversation between leading Israelis and American Jews. Crowds of Israelis and American tourists, brimming with comments and questions, attended the sessions in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The "dialogue" brought together American Jewish and Israeli writers and intellectuals for four days of uninhibited talk on the question of Jewish identity and the role of the Jewish intellectual in the Jewish community of America and of Israel.

Two major themes emerged from the "dialogue":

1) While many American Jews are struggling to define a "meaningful Jewish identity," most Israelis consider the problem solved by merely living in Israel. 2) The role of the Jewish writer is not to promote the Jewish ethnic tradition but to probe the human condition.

A highlight of the "dialogue" was a lively exchange between the American participants and the, at that time, Prime Minister, David Ben-Gurion. The conversation took place in Mr. Ben-Gurion's office just 24 hours after he startled the country by tendering his resignation. The Israeli leader chided American Jews for not knowing the Hebrew language or Jewish history. "Without these two minimum requirements," he warned, "I cannot envisage that American Jews will long remain Jews."

Shad Polier, of New York, chairman of the governing council of the American Jewish Congress and leader of the U.S. delegation participating in the "dialogue," told the Prime Minister that American Jews were in no danger of disappearing, but that they were seeking to find a "valid expression" of their Jewishness. One such expression, Polier said, could be seen in the active role played by many Jews in the American struggle for civil rights and Negro equality. He said this was in line with the Jewish heritage of social justice, equality, and human brotherhood, handed down by the Biblical prophets.

Self-criticism marked much of the "dialogue" conversations. Edwin Wolf II, of Philadelphia, president of the National Foundation for Jewish Culture, warned that many Jewish intellectuals in America were becoming "alienated" from organized community life. He expressed concern at their reluctance to see beneath the surface of American Judaism, whose materialist values they reject, to the enduring Jewish values beneath."

Israel Supreme Court Justice Haim Cohen pleaded with his countrymen to "jealously safeguard the free choice of the individual to make his own definition of Judaism." Leslie Fiedler, American critic and novelist, key-noted a provocative session when he asserted that the "essential nature of Jewishness" was "not to belong, but to be in exile, to be alienated." He explained:

"In the past, living under hostile governments or dominated by hostile religious groups, the Jew was a natural 'outsider'. Today, however, the majority of Jews live in the United States, and Israel, both liberal countries, and no longer suffer the burden of being outside the mainstream of the societies in which they live. As a result, Jews are ceasing to be Jews. For myself, I submit as a Jew to the burden of being the outsider, the burden of bearing witness to the inequality that exists in the world."

Philip Roth, young American novelist and author of "Goodbye, Columbus," said he felt that "the role of the Jew is not to be the victim but rather the great dissenter from the values of our affluent civilization, the one who says 'nay' to the materialistic values of our culture."

Dr. W. Z. Low, professor of physics at Hebrew University, and an Orthodox Jew, said he had "never had any difficulty" in finding his Jewish identity. He declared: "Past generations of Jews had a strong sense of 'galut' or exile' but in a positive sense: They knew they were not truly at home in the countries they lived in; they knew their true home was the Jewish community; and they knew that some day this Jewish community would have a home of its own.

"What matters today," he continued, "is our answer to the question: how much do we know about Jewishness?" He went on: "The Jewish intellectual must increase his knowledge of Jewish history, must have a positive attitude toward that knowledge, and must look to that history for a guide in meeting the problems of today and tomorrow."

Serving as moderator of the panel, Shad Polier, of New York, lawyer and civil rights leader, said that in the U.S. many Jewish intellectuals were actively engaged in the struggle for racial equality as an expression of their Jewish identity. He cited the leading role played by the American Jewish Congress and other Jewish groups, working closely with Negro organizations, in fighting discrimination through law and social action.

An Israeli panelist, Sholom Kahn, professor of American literature at Hebrew University, then asked: "Is the problem of the Negro in America a Jewish problem?"

To which Max Lerner, Brandeis University professor, replied: "Yes, because the web of freedom must be an unbroken one. When that web of freedom is broken for the Negro, it is broken for the Jew and for every American. At the same time, it is a Jewish problem because the struggle for social justice is in the historical tradition of the Jewish people. I fight for civil rights as part of my Jewish identity."

Mr. Fiedler returned to the discussion by challenging the idea that because Jewish values had been broadly accepted by Western society, in principle, at least, they were no longer Jewish values. "Jews have always sought to transmit their prophetic teachings to other groups. One effective way has been via Christianity, which introduced and spread Jewish prophetic teachings widely. The fact that some of these values have been accepted by others does not

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS CONGRATULATES QUEBEC CABINET ON ADOPTION OF ANTI-DISCRIMINATION PROVISIONS IN HOTELS ACT

The Canadian Jewish Congress, of which Michael Garber, Q.C., is president, issued a public statement congratulating the Quebec Cabinet on the Government Bill which was unanimously approved by the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, making discrimination in any form illegal in the hotels, restaurants, and camping grounds of the Province, which read:

"People of good will, interested in a democratic community, will congratulate the Quebec Cabinet on the Government Bill amending the Hotels Act and making discrimination in any form illegal in the hotels, restaurants, and camping grounds of the Province, and to the Legislative Assembly for its unanimous approval. Apart from the legal considerations in the Act, all experience proves that such legislation is the best educational tool.

"The Canadian Jewish Congress is pleased that this legislation was introduced, having urged it for some time, not because discrimination is practised generally in Quebec but because such a law comes to the rescue of those even in the isolated cases where discrimination exists. The Hon. Carrier Fortin, Minister Without Portfolio, who introduced the Bill, is alleged to have stated that there are very few such cases but anyone with any experience in these matters will attest to the fact that there are a sufficient number to warrant the introduction of the Bill. In fact, not so long ago, one of the resort hotels in the Laurentians was sued for breach of contract and an out of court settlement was arrived at. Some benighted hotel owners persist in advertising their hotels in such a way as to make it abundantly clear that only those of certain color and religious affiliation would be accepted. The documentation is sufficient to have justified the Government in taking its action though it is equally true that Quebec's record is by no means one of intense prejudice.

"The Canadian Jewish Congress, in hailing this legislation, hopes that it will be followed by a Fair Employment Practices Act such as exists in several provinces in Canada."

Congratulatory telegrams were sent to the Hon. Jean Lesage, Prime Minister of Quebec, and to the Hon. Carrier Fortin by the Congress.

As reported in the press, in presenting the amendment, Mr. Fortin said he believed it would serve as an example to other provinces and to many American states. He said that "discrimination is not practiced generally in Quebec" but the law is designed to prevent isolated instances and to ensure that visitors to the province, especially those who come for the World's Fair, will be received anywhere without incident. "We want to affirm the principle that all people have equal rights here," he said.

Text of the amendment is as follows: "No owner or tenant of a hotel, restaurant, or campaign ground shall directly or through his agent or a third party: a) refuse to provide any person or class of persons with lodging, food, or any other service available to the public in the establishment, or b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to lodging, food, or any other service available to the public in the establishment, because of the race, creed, color, nationality, ancestry, or place of origin of such person or class of persons".

According to the terms of the Hotels Act, any person found guilty of an offence is liable to a fine of $20 to $100 for each offence and; in the case of subsequent offence within two years, to fine of from $50 to $200. No prosecution for any infraction of the discrimination clause can be undertaken without the written authorization of the Minister of Tourism, Fish, and Game.

The original law left a hotel owner the right to refuse a person for food and lodging if there was just cause. The "just cause" provision came under severe attack from various groups as being too vague and still open to abuse.
